Fig From Jun. to next Feb.

Common Fig is a gynodioecious (functionally dioecious) species of flowering plants in the mulberry family (Moraceae Ficus), tropical deciduous tree or large shrub, growing in the torrid zone and the temperate zone. There are overall eight hundreds varieties of ficus carica around the world, most of which belong to evergreen species save those that grow in the temperate zone being deciduous species. The fig, although commonly referred to as a fruit, is actually the infructescence known as a false fruit in the shape of a bulbous root where at the bottom grows a hollow-ended stem, in which the flowers and seeds are borne: close to the small orifice blossom male flowers while far on the top blossom the females. It also grows sterile flowers, and thereafter the fruit grows seeds, the Blastophaga psenes will enter the fruit and pollinate the flowers.

The primary production area of longans is located in the low-altitude mountains of central and southern Taiwan. With approximately 13 varieties, fresh longans are shiny and translucent, not sticky or soggy, and taste sweet and refreshing. Longans can be dried by roasting them in the kilns invented by our ancestors. Longan branches are used as firewood for slow burning, preserving the flesh's nutrients, and improving the taste. Dried longans are among Taiwan's specialty agricultural products that are often sought when people visit our island.

Pomelo From Sep. to Oct.

Taiwan has 14 species of pomelos, including madouwendan pomelo, white pomelo, and pomelo, with madouwendan pomelo being the most popular. Pomelos contain para-insulin, which has a hypoglycemic effect, making it ideal for people who have issues with diabetes or obesity. Moreover, pomelos contain considerable naringin, which can reduce blood's viscosity and prevent blood clots and stroke. With thin peels and a unique aroma, pomelos are sweet, soft, and juicy.

kiwi fruit From Sep. to next Apr.

A kiwi fruit contains multiple kinds of vitamins. Consuming two kiwis per day during the summer season can not merely increase the amount of calcium within the body, but empower a greater absorbing capacity that leads progressively to the improvement of a negative sleep disorder. The slight sourness of a kiwi can adequately stimulate bowel motion, enhance digestive power, and reduce flatulence.

Taiwanese persimmons are generally categorized as either astringent persimmons or sweet persimmons. Astringent persimmons are larger than sweet persimmons and are regularly shaped. After removing the astringency, they become crisp fruit, which are commonly called brittle persimmons. Sweet persimmons are smaller, and their tops are circular with a flat spheroid. The skin is red and yellow. When they ripen, the color turns bright red with a fine flesh and a crisp, sweet, and juicy taste. Sweet persimmons are best enjoyed fresh.

Jujube From Dec. to next Feb.

Cultivated in both Taiwan and India, jujubes look like green apples. Traditional jujubes have been modified through professional Taiwanese techniques to achieve a tasty, succulent, sweet, crisp, and fleshy fruit, making it one of Taiwan's high-grade products. With a shiny light green peel, jujubes are rich in vitamins C, B1, and B2. As for vitamin C, it has five times more than a watermelon, nine times more than a pear, and 20 times more than an apple, thus earning it the name "Vitamin C Fruit".

The fruit of caimito is highly recommended for direct consumption. After its yellow maturity, the pulp of its displays a translucent colloidal matter just like the feature of a jelly whose taste is sweet, smooth, and chewy. But for the reason of its high content of colloid and iron within the skin, we suggest that it be eaten right after cutting since it is so fragile that oxidation often occurs and results in a brown-colored appearance on the surface.
